What is Dyslexia?

Dyslexia is a neurological learning disability caused by a difference in the way the brain is wired to understand the speech sounds that make up words and then pair those with their written letter patterns. Dyslexia is NOT related to a person's IQ.

About 20% of people worldwide are born with dyslexia.

How is it Treated?

Structured literacy (Orton-Gillingham) is the "gold standard" for dyslexia treatment and has been scientifically backed by more than three decades of research from The National Institutes of Health.

Not only is structured literacy the only effective method to help struggling readers and writers, but overall, it is also the best way to teach the foundations of literacy to all students.

FAQ

How is structured literacy therapy different from tutoring?

Our students need direct, explicit instruction that is individualized and emotionally sound. Our students need ten times more practice opportunities than a typical student needs.

Does structured literacy work?

Yes, decades of research shows that if you partner with an expert using a structured literacy curriculum with adequate amounts of controlled practice, most students will achieve independence in their reading and writing.

How is therapy structured?

You'll meet with your therapist once a week for a direct, one on one, therapy session tailored specifically for your child. We encourage parents to attend the sessions as well, learning along with their child. After the session, the therapist will create a practice plan for the week that includes games, review videos and practice activities.
